

Computer Use - Acceptable Use Policy

The Internet has created new opportunities to conduct research on a wide variety of topics related to State business. For that reason, Internet access is made available. It should go without saying, however, that employees may only use the Internet at work to conduct state business. There is no expectation of privacy when using State issued resources.

The Division of Information Technology (DOIT) has an Acceptable Use Policy to ensure that employees have a clear understanding of what is considered to be the acceptable and proper use of State-owned hardware and software, computer network access and usage, Internet and email usage, telephony, and security and privacy for users of the State of Rhode Island Wide Area Network.
